

EXPERT CONDEMNS ARMENIANS FOR BYRZA RECALL

Posted on January 1, 2012 by Keghart

Category: Opinions

On Dec 30, 2011 News.Az interviewed Yuri Sigov, a political expert on the South Caucasus and post-Soviet countries, author of "Azerbaijan: Between East and West".

News.Az - US officials deny that in the last few years they have become more passive in the post-Soviet area and, moreover, promise to show the fruit of their work. How do you assess 2011 in terms of American policy in the post-Soviet area?

Yuri Sigov.- America under Barack Obama has really begun to pay less attention to international affairs. This is an official line and will continue as long as the current administration is in the White House. As for the post-Soviet republics, today they are not in the second or even the third line of importance for the US. However, declarative statements on the alleged importance of this region can be heard often enough. And if you look closely, you will see that these statements are made either by the heads of CIS countries themselves (in order to raise the bar of their own importance in US policy - allegedly) or by US officials who need to justify their salaries and positions working on post-Soviet issues.

On Dec 30, 2011 News.Az interviewed Yuri Sigov, a political expert on the South Caucasus and post-Soviet countries, author of "Azerbaijan: Between East and West".

News.Az - US officials deny that in the last few years they have become more passive in the post-Soviet area and, moreover, promise to show the fruit of their work. How do you assess 2011 in terms of American policy in the post-Soviet area?

Yuri Sigov.- America under Barack Obama has really begun to pay less attention to international affairs. This is an official line and will continue as long as the current administration is in the White House. As for the post-Soviet republics, today they are not in the second or even the third line of importance for the US. However, declarative statements on the alleged importance of this region can be heard often enough. And if you look closely, you will see that these statements are made either by the heads of CIS countries themselves (in order to raise the bar of their own importance in US policy - allegedly) or by US officials who need to justify their salaries and positions working on post-Soviet issues.

In the past year, the US didn't once "stick its nose" in the post-Soviet area and kept itself quite aloof, but at the same time it was always close to those CIS countries who wish to develop primarily with the assistance of the US. Yes, it's important for the future of Afghanistan that the US has close contact with the Central Asian countries, but there's no need to exaggerate all of this – America's problems today are domestic, deciding on future development, and, much as it might like to, the post-Soviet area cannot help in any way.

AZ.- The Armenian lobby got what it wanted: on Tuesday, President Ilham Aliyev received Matthew Bryza to mark the completion of his mission as ambassador. How can you explain the paradoxical state structure of the USA, in which ethnic groups can block a decision of the White House?

YS.- It's not only in the US that the ethnic lobby works actively. Look at France, Canada and the Czech Republic! The question is the target of this hectic activity and its results. Now the election campaign in the US is in full swing and no one cares about anything except the candidates and their closest teams. Here is an example: when Obama was fighting for the White House three years ago, two out of three Americans were worried about what was going on in Iraq. And now, in two dozen debates of Republican candidates only one in ten Americans are interested in international affairs and that is only Afghanistan (and only because their relatives or acquaintances are serving there).

The fact that the ethnic lobby pushes its interests to the top has nothing to do with the ordinary citizens of the country. Moreover, not everyone even in the State Department knows that the envoy is leaving Baku, not to mention a wider audience. And yet, yes – this is the American system – congressmen are elected, not appointed by the authorities. And they do whatever is necessary for their voters (to be more precise, for their re-election). And the ethnic lobby assists them whenever necessary.

AZ.- In your opinion, how harmful to Azerbaijani-US relations are delays in the appointment of a US ambassador to Azerbaijan? How do you view the typical White House statement that this is a technical, not political issue?

YS.- On the one hand, yes, it is somehow a technical issue and it doesn't matter who the ambassador is – he doesn't define policy and is only an official executor (he is not the first figure in government). But this question is quite symbolic – it's not right to say that it doesn't matter who will be appointed and who dismissed. For example, the confusion over the appointment and recall of the ambassador leaves a bad taste in the Azerbaijani leadership. For the White House, it's just a bureaucratic game which has no importance within the US; for small countries, such "technical aspects" provide food for thought, quite possibly not the most joyful.

AZ.- Is there any premise to expect progress on a Karabakh settlement in 2012 when we didn't see any in the past year?

YS.- I think that concerning Karabakh, no concrete decisions – no breakthroughs or even decisions that give the slightest forward shift to resolution of the problem will be made in the coming year, if, of course, no military activities start again for any reason, which cannot be ruled out. Don't forget that the question of Iran is still "up in the air" for the US and 2012 is an election year in America. It's difficult to predict what will happen here and how, but it seems to me that a Karabakh denouement can happen when it is least expected because I don't see any logically explicable options for the peaceful and diplomatic settlement of the conflict.

