

HISTORIC ANGEGHAKOT AND ITS POET

Posted on April 24, 2014 by Keghart

Category: Opinions

Joseph Dagdigian, Harvard MA, USA, 29 March 2014

Angeghakot, a village of about 2,000-3,000 people (figures vary) in southern Armenia, is about 10 km. from Sisian, the regional capital of Syunik province. Travelers from Yerevan, on the way to Karabagh, pass by Angeghakot before entering the Lachin Corridor. The drive from Yerevan to Angeghakot takes roughly four hours.

With an altitude of about 6,000 feet, summer days are hot but evenings can be cool. Thus, unlike some other regions of Armenia, little fruit is grown here. Agriculture consists primarily of raising livestock and planting grains.

Joseph Dagdigian, Harvard MA, USA, 29 March 2014

Angeghakot, a village of about 2,000-3,000 people (figures vary) in southern Armenia, is about 10 km. from Sisian, the regional capital of Syunik province. Travelers from Yerevan, on the way to Karabagh, pass by Angeghakot before entering the Lachin Corridor. The drive from Yerevan to Angeghakot takes roughly four hours.

With an altitude of about 6,000 feet, summer days are hot but evenings can be cool. Thus, unlike some other regions of Armenia, little fruit is grown here. Agriculture consists primarily of raising livestock and planting grains.

Upon entering Angeghakot, we asked for direction to historical sites. In all instance we were advised to find Mayolis Karapetyan, the repository of Angeghakot's history and culture.

We found him, and learned that Angeghakot's history dates to the Stone and Bronze Ages. In or near the village are monuments attributed to the Vartanants War against Persia. Mayolis took us to the small Sourp Vartan Church, half built into the side of a hill, at the back of stone-cutting machinery. It is said the site was visited by Saint Vartan's soldiers returning from the Battle of Avarayr (451 AD), though the sign on the church indicates it was built in the 13th century.

Some believe Saint Vartan Mamigonian may be buried there, although there are a number of such sites purporting to contain his remains. Mayolis believes he has evidence that St. Vartan is buried in the valley below, under what appears to be a large man-made hill. In an Angeghakot cemetery there is a tomb said to have been constructed by St. Vartan's daughter, Shushanik, for her father. Instead, Shushanik is the one who is buried there. Also in the cemetery are pre-Christian monuments converted into Christian tombstones. The medieval historian Stepanos Orbelian (1250-1305) says that Christianity was first brought to Armenia in Syunik by Saint Bartholomew, one of Christ's disciples

In 1699, Sisian-born Israel Ori (1658-1711), who spent several decades in Europe learning European military science, returned to Armenia to help liberate the country from the Persians and Ottoman

Turks. He visited Angeghakot to meet Melik Safraz (Meliks were local princes who ruled their regions.) and succeeded in getting the meliks to put aside their differences and present a united petition to Russian Czar Peter the Great and the Pope to intervene militarily in Armenia to save Armenia's Christians.

Ori died prematurely in 1711, without implementing his plan. His efforts inspired a Persian-Armenian revolutionary, Joseph Emin (1726-1809), to enlist foreign help to liberate Armenia, but this too failed. According to Mayolis, Ori's meeting with the meliks took place at Melik Safraz's home in the outskirts of Angeghakot. The house no longer stands, he said, but perhaps during our next visit we will visit the site of Melik Safraz's house anyway.

This region was a battleground for other revolutionaries who fought to preserve the region's independence. In the 1720s, David Beg defended this region. His commander, Mkhitar Sbarabed, who was assassinated, is buried in the Valley of Khnsoresk less than an hour from Angeghakot.

There are three other medieval churches in the village: Sourp Astvadzadzsin, Sourp Stepanos, and Sourp Hazaraprgich. Next to Sourp Astvadzadzin are buried officers who served under General Antranig while defending this region in the late 1800s and early 1900s. Elsewhere in the village is a small cemetery with the graves of Armenian fedayees (freedom fighters) from the same era. I'm told these soldiers likely fought under General Keri (or one of the other military leaders who helped the villagers defend this territory). One tombstone portrays a soldier standing next to his rifle.

Near a World War II memorial are the graves of Angeghakot's martyrs who died fighting for Artsakh's liberation. Every village in Armenia has such a cemetery. While Angeghakot does not have huge cathedrals and fortresses (though there are some in the mountains nearby), it boasts a rich and ancient history—if the visitor asks around. While there are no tourist amenities, hotels, or restaurants in the village, these are available 20 minutes away in Sisian. Angeghakot does offer a window into Armenian history, current village life, and Armenia's constant struggle for independence.

While enjoying refreshments at the end of our visit, Mayolis's young granddaughter recited, from memory, some of his poetry, while two older grandsons split wood in preparation for the winter.

Mayolis has no means to publish his poetry. My wife Lisa and I offered to publish a limited number of copies upon our return to the U.S. Our friend, Berge Jololian, who makes three to four trips annually to donate computers to schools in the region (see www.facebook.com/techedarmenia), acted as an intermediary, bringing manuscripts back and forth. We have printed a limited number of Karapetyan's poetry booklets at no expense to the author. The booklets, in Armenian and including a photograph of the author with his granddaughter, contain 35 poems. It is likely that we'll publish more copies in Armenia.

The booklets are available for $10 plus $2 shipping and handling. All proceeds will go to the author. For more information, call Joseph Dagdigian at (978) 772-9417. The books are also available from the

